More specifically, the present disclosure relates to techniques for generating, generating, and maintaining a probability model for responses to a survey. A survey is a process for collecting information, where the information is structured in a prescribed manner and provided in a quantitative form. Surveys are frequently used to gather information for a variety of purposes, such as to provide an indication of how a population of entities, for example, a group of stakeholders, an individual, or a product, is likely to behave in different situations. Typically, surveys are conducted by a surveyor, who interviews or otherwise collects information from entities by requesting responses to questions and/or other conditions. During an interview, the surveyor provides a set of questions to a respondent. Often, the surveyor is provided an objective, where the questions are directly related to the survey or the objective, and the surveyor asks the respondent a series of questions about the subject. For example, the surveyor can ask the respondent how they plan to handle a particular issue, or whether they prefer one aspect of a product over another, and can ask a series of questions to elicit this information. The surveyor can also present an entity with
