Dexmedetomidine/propofol versus propofol sedation for simultaneous aortic arch replacement and mitral valve replacement. This study was designed to compare dexmedetomidine/propofol and propofol sedation for complex single-stage surgery. Seventy consecutive patients who were scheduled to undergo aortic arch replacement for aortic arch aneurysm and simultaneous mitral valve replacement were divided into two groups: 35 patients in the propofol sedation group (group 1) and 35 patients in the dexmedetomidine/propofol group (group 2). The sedative agents were given as follows: 100 µg of intravenous dexmedetomidine (group 2) or 1.5 mg/kg of propofol (group 1) was administered for 30 min after induction with intravenous anesthesiologist-selected doses of other sedative drugs. Bispectral index score was obtained after induction in the operating room, 5 min after the administration of the sedative agent in the recovery room, and 2 h after administration of the sedative agent in the postanesthesia care unit. In the recovery room after the administration of the sedative agent, the rate of recovery of consciousness and the mean duration of spontaneous breathing were significantly higher in group 2 than in group 1, with no difference in hemodynamic parameters. In the postanesthesia care unit, the administration of the sedative agent was accompanied by an increase in the rate of recovery of consciousness in both groups. However, the mean duration of spontaneous breathing was significantly longer in group 1 than
