It is considered one of Shakespeare's early works; a view shared by 20th century scholars but rejected by Elizabethan critics and playwrights. The play is loosely based on a real event, the so-called "Bond" case in Venice in 1575, in which a Jewish moneylender named Gratiano accused Antonio, a wealthy and well-regarded Venetian citizen, of defaulting on his loan. It was one of the first of Shakespeare's plays to be printed, in the First Folio of 1623, and is most famous for the famous courtroom scene in which Portia (Shylock's illiterate niece) tricks Shylock into giving up his revenge by persuading him that he can convert "all the world
