To assess the prevalence of linguistic errors in medical reports (MRs) and the knowledge base used for reporting. A nationwide survey was conducted involving two-stage stratified random sampling of 1261 radiologists. The guestionnaire consists of 64 statements related to MRs. The correct answer for each statement is "yes." The prevalence of correct answers, and percentage of correct answers versus incorrect answers, was analyzed. Three hundred fifty-one radiologists returned the survey. The respondents indicated "yes" to 4% of the statements; the other 96% answered "no," "no information," or indicated that they had no opinion. The most prevalent errors were confusion with "or" (38%), "medial" (31%), and "fused" (19%) when reporting the inferior pedicle (IP) tunnel. The largest correct percentage for interpretation of "fat and calcification" (50%) was attributed to "dual-beam," "water and air" (24%), and "pendular" (28%). The correct percentages for "hypoplastic" and "ectopic" were 23% and 14%, respectively. The correct percentage for the definition of "superior compartment," " inferior compartment," and "lesion" were 10%, 8%, and 6%, respectively. Radiologists commonly made linguistic errors: these errors were more frequent in some subspecialties and less frequent when the report was for general medicine, and certain classes of radiological findings. These errors are a concern, and especially so for the more poorly trained radiologists. They should be addressed.O: Converting generic C# class to a lambda I'm adding a method to a generic class from a 3rd party API. This method is supposed to wrap a required object as a wrapper object.
