got goals this summer—cooking them, eating them, looking at them, making them, living them, etc. But are they really worth having? Only if they align with your goals. And a recent study shows that people who give up on their goals experience a reduced capacity for goal pursuit. It's tough to quit. Quitting motivates you and it motivates the people around you. The consequences are also clear: high levels of stress and physical risks, for example. But quitting won't automatically impact your capacity to pursue goals. The study was published in the Journal of Experimental Social Psychology. Researchers conducted two experiments. In both experiments, some participants could see the goals, whereas others could not. Those who could see their goals tended to pursue them. However, those who couldn't see their goals were less likely to pursue them. Quitting isn't an instant thing. Many research studies have shown that people experience more physical stress the longer they spend on quitting. It's always a good idea to talk with your doctor or therapist before quitting. (And if you're quitting an addiction, it might be a good idea to talk with the people around you too.) In today's world it's hard to think of a goal that we don't
